It is a prerequisite to many applications in different fields to separate a set of data items into homogenous clusters. In this context, a data item may be a member of R^k or a complex mathematical entity encompassing several properties. Homogeneity, too, is a general concept which is defined differently in different contexts. In effect, the ability to work with abstract models for data items and clusters has important economical benefits, in terms of not only the reusability of the algorithms, but also the reuse of actual computer code. Visual Assessment of Cluster Tendency (VAT) is a discovery mechanism which has been shown to work desirably within the context of prototype-based clustering. However, VAT has been shown to suffer from high costs of operation, especially in the context of Big Data. While the research community has invested heavily on proposing alternatives to VAT, a generic cost-effective unsupervised cluster discovery algorithm is not within reach. In this work, we demonstrate that the VAT comparison and reordering mechanism can be applied at the level of clusters, instead of its classical application at the level of data items....
